SUBMARINE BOATWITHIN ACRUISER Designs for a New Naval Monster Which

Is a Ship Within a Ship. From the New York Journal.

From the New York Journal.

Here is a new naval monster. It is a ship within a ship, and it represents an entirely new and novel use to which out great cruisers may be put.

Without in any degree lessening the power or speed of these vessels, making absolutely no change in their exterior appearance, this new appliance enormously increases their effectiveness as weapons of war. By this device our large men-of-war are enabled to carry in their hold and in a place from which it can be easily released, a modern submarine boat such as that which the United States government is about to launch at Baltimore.

Here, safely housed in the body of the ship, the submarine boat can be carried right into the scene of action, to be released only when the enemy is near by, like a huge torpedo. With the crew of the submarine boat at work inside of her, the captain in his conning tower, the engineers at the batteries and dynamos, and the torpedo men at their places in the forward compartment where the Whiteheads are kept, this deadly weapon of destruction may be launched unseen by the enemy, bethis deadly weapon of destruction may be launched unseen by the enemy, be-cause it will all be below the water

ne. There would be nothing about the ap-There would be nothing about the appearance of the cruiser to show that she carried so deadly a weapon as a submarine boat. Lying in close proximity to a hostile battleship, 7he officers of the latter might scrutinize her closely without seeing a single thing to arouse their suspicions while the submarine boat was being actually launched almost under their eyes.

But the greatest advantage of this new departure is the fact that it enormously increases the effectiveness of submarine boats. At present the great problem in the construction of these craft and the thing that hitherto has interefered with their extensive use as weapons of warfare, has been their inability to make long voyages under water.

It is impracticable to place storage batteries in such a boat capable of driving her 50 miles under water. The available storage battery system suitable to submarine boats at the present time will not drive them much more than 20 miles will submerged without turn to the very dock whence they set out.

This makes the radius of action of submarine boats when submerged and relying upon electricity so small as to reduce their effectiveness to a minimum. On the other hand, the cumbersome and elaborate machinery put into submarine boats for steaming on the surface not only occupies the greater part of their available space and makes a stiffing heat, but compels them frequently to come to or remain upon the surface in full view of the enemy.

Here, however, is a scheme whereby the submarine boat, with her batteries fully charged with electricity and dispensing altogether with steam, may be brought into close proximity to her intended victim before being sent upon her errand of destruction. Such a submarine boat would form part of the submarine boat would be part of the regular crew of the cruiser. They would only take their places just before the submarine boat was to be launched. After she had come back from her under water voyage and had taken her place in the "nest" prepared for her in the body of the cruiser, the crew might step out from the confinement of the submarine boat into the hold of the submarine boat into the h

The designs and plans for this novel combination of a cruiser and subma-rine boat have been drawn up and sent combination of a cruiser and submarrine boat have been drawn up and sent to Washington in an application for a patent by G. E. Coffin, the marine artist. Mr. Coffin's intimacy with naval construction has made him familiar with what is feasible in building menof-war. He recognized the powerlessness of submarine boats when operating away from a base of electric supply, and the fact that in order to be effective they must be started out on their journey when the enemy is near by. In this way he conceived the idea of actually placing the submarine boat inside a man-of-war in such a way that she could be easily launched when the proper time arrived.

While in some respects this scheme resembles the carrying of torpedoes by battleships into the presence of the enemy and the launching of them from the stern at the intended victim, yet the great size and weight of a submarine boat makes the feat radically different. Mr. Coffin's plans provide for a submarine boat from 20 to 30 feet in length, capable of carrying a crew of about five men. She fits into a great tube 12 feet marine boat from 20 to 30 feet in length, capable of carrying a crew of about five men. She fits into a great tube 12 feet in diameter, which runs athwartships in the cruiser and is situated forward of the engines and boilers.

This tube is made of heavy steel, to resist the pressure, and runs the whole way across the ship. It opens into the sea on the port side, under the water line, where a series of doors swinging on hinges and opened from the inside of the ship, make it absolutely watertight when closed. The shape of the modern man-of-war is such that these doors can be made water-tight without in any way altering the smooth exterior of the sides or the lines of the hull.

compartment of her bow. Compresses air for the use of the crew might also be received from the ship.

When the cruiser or battleship carrying this deadly vessel inside of her cams within sight of the enemy the crew of the submarine boat would at once be sent to their places. Closing the water-tight hatches behind them, they would be hermetically sealed within the cigar-shaped vessel. At the same time the water-tight doors of the steel tube would be closed by the men of the cruiser working inside her hold. These the water would be admitted until the tube surrounding the submarine boat would be completely floodsd, and at the same time the big steel doors leading to the sea would be fully opened, leaving a free passage for the craft.

At this stage of the proceedings one of the simplest and most ingenious features of Mr. Coffin's invention would be brought into play. This consists of the pumping of water into the tube for the pumping of water into the tube for the pumping of water into the tube for the pumping of water into the tube friently powerful to draw her out backward from the ship, yet Mr. Coffin has arranged a series of big 18-inch pipes leading from the sea into the furthest end of the tube.

Each pipe feeds a powerful turbine pump. The pumps working together would force an enormous pressure of water into the furthest end of the tube.

mander could look at him through camera lucida while submerged or code gently come to the surface just new enough to let the top of the conning tower rise above the water.

This conning tower would be telescopic, folding inward when the boat was housed in her "nest," and extended when at sea. One such sight when near by the enemy would be enough.

Plunging beneath the water blanket that would absolutely protect her from sight as well as from all hostile fire, she would rapidly and relentlessly come upon har victim, stealing under her bottom and preparing to back away as she fired her torpedo. One such torpedo, well almed, would pursue fix course when released from the how at the submarine boat, and, coming home under the bottom of the hostile ship, would explode by contact and send her to the bottom.

The submarine boat which fired the torpedo might by this time be safety out of danger. The officers and crew of the victim would never know what hit them, and the unseen enemy would still have three more torpedoes for other vessels in the hostile fleet. She might then return to her cruiser, several miles off, or if the distance were not too great might, with her large reserve of electric power, return to land.

The submarine boat could, it is op-
